Section A

Answer this question.

1 The Asian Development Bank meets in Indonesia

In 2009, the Asian Development Bank, representing 67 member countries, held its annual meeting in Bali, Indonesia. It warned that 61 million people in Asia would remain trapped in extreme poverty because of the global downturn and that this figure could double if slow growth continued for the next few years.

It reported that many governments in Asia, especially those in Japan, South Korea and China, were using fiscal policy to try to stimulate economies in the region. The Japanese Finance Minister stated that, 'the Asian region needs to increase domestic demand to avoid economic downturn.' Public spending on health care and state benefits, for example, could be a crucial step to boosting confidence and reducing the human cost of such an economic downturn.

Some observers at the meeting, held at an international convention centre surrounded by five star hotels, commented that these luxury hotels provided a clear contrast to the poverty experienced throughout Asia. More than 900 million people in Asia live on US$1.25 or less a day.

- (a) (i) Define fiscal policy. [2]
- (ii) Explain how fiscal policy could be used to increase domestic demand. [4]
- (b) Assess whether public spending on health care or public spending on state benefits would be more successful in stimulating an economy. [4]
- (c) Explain two possible reasons why so many people in Asia have to live on US$1.25 or less a day. [4]
- (d) Discuss the possible effectiveness of government policies, other than spending on health care and state benefits, in reducing poverty. [6]

Section B
